

"When purchasing equine art, collectors should look for an artist with a true connection to horses as this will enrich and authenticate their work."

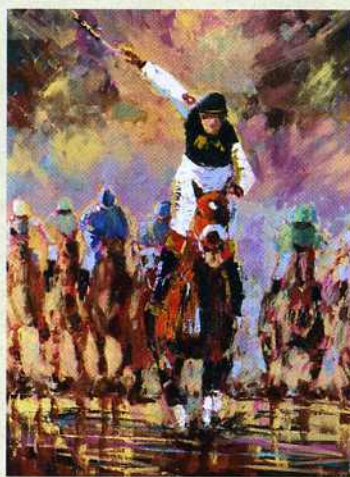

— Pamela Campe, director, Gardner Colby Gallery

"Anyone who has ever owned a horse understands that one must learn their method of communication. A horse's mood is signaled by small gestures—the position of the ears, the softness of the eye, a flaring of the nostrils," says Underhill. "I attempt to capture a horse's mood and inspire viewers to study the paintings and form their own ideas on what the animal is thinking."

Artist Drew Sarka has always been inspired by the beauty and form of horses. "My background as a family physician has taught me the importance of careful observation," says Sarka, "and my knowledge of anatomy helps me accurately paint the horse structure with a sensitivity and expression that is appropriate for capturing the essence of these beautiful creatures." ●
